9. RINGKASAN

The study of how corrupt behaviors affect economic institutions, development, and consequences is known as the economics of corruption. Corruption is defined as the abuse of power for personal benefit, which is frequently accomplished through bribery, embezzlement, nepotism, and other illegal behaviors. It can have a significant impact on a variety of economic factors, including growth, investment, efficiency, inequality, and total welfare. Because of its consistent economic growth and expanding population of productive young people, ASEAN is quickly becoming one of the world's most important regions. Unfortunately, several member countries have struggled to curb corruption, which raises the cost of running the economic machine. Several studies have been conducted to investigate the causes or sources of corruption in various countries. Some frequent characteristics used to analyze the roots of corruption include institutional structure, economic condition, political regime, degree of education, and level of economic inequality. Unfortunately, considering the extent of variances observed among the countries, there are no convincing results on what the agreed sources are. As a result, this study examines selected ASEAN countries. The panel data approach is used to calculate the magnitude of independent variables in comparison to dependent variables. The corruption index is the dependent variable, and the independence variables are institutional structure, economic size, political regime, educational level, economic inequality, and religiosity. This study makes a contribution by taking the spiritual side into account. The findings suggest that religiosity and economic educational level have a negative and significant impact.
